Optic neuritis is a common clinical syndrome with which most ophthalmologists will be confronted, and is usually associated with multiple sclerosis. The diagnosis of optic neuritis is based on a characteristic set of clinical signs and should be confirmed by visual-field and/or visual-evoked-potential testing. Treatment is aimed at minimising visual loss while controlling acute disease. Early treatment is associated with better long-term prognosis. The role of glucocorticoids in the acute treatment of optic neuritis is controversial. In the acute treatment of optic neuritis, glucocorticoids are of unproven benefit.Influence of age and sex on the sensitivity of the assay for immunoglobulin E antibody in cats.
